Minoan Archaeological Sites - Ancient Greece
The Bronze Age in Crete started in about 3500 BC, with what the archaeologist Arthur Evans termed the Minoan Civilisation. The Minoans were defeated by the Bronze Age Myceneans in about 1400 BC. After the downfall of the Myceneans Crete was ruled by various Ancient Greek societies until the Romans conquered the island in 69 BC and made Gortyn their capital.

The Cretan land is full of ancient graves, highlighting the great care of the Cretans for the dead. In the Bronze Age (6000 BC-3500 BC) the simple deposition of dead inside caves was abandoned and use of cemeteries was widespread. During the Minoan era, in some areas of eastern Crete, including Gournia, Mochlos and Palekastro,...

Homeric archaeology long dominated the study of early Greece, but new approaches have recently revolutionized the field. Drawing from these approaches, I offer a regional and diachronic analysis of Homeric stories about Crete, an assessment of the reception of these stories by the island's inhabitants throughout antiquity and an account of their impact on medieval to modern literature and art.
Crete is the largest of all the Greek islands, and the fifth largest in the Mediterranean. The island has been attracting people for millennia, thanks in large part to the mild climate as a result of being halfway between Europe and Africa. Mythologically, Crete is said to be the origins of Europe.

In his work, Description of the Island of Crete, he identifies the caves at Gortyn as the site of the labyrinth. Other visitors to Gortyn include William Lithgow in 1610, and in 1680 the English traveller Bernard Randolph, who remained in the Labyrinth for one hour.

The Heraklion Archaeological Museum is a Special Regional Service of the Ministry of Culture and its purpose is to acquire, safeguard, conserve, record, study, publish, display and promote Cretan artefacts from the Prehistoric to the Late Roman periods.

In 1900, British archaeologist Sir Arthur Evans had begun digging at the site of Knossos on the northeast coast of Crete and, within months, had discovered what he named the “Palace of Minos ...
the capital of Minoan Crete. It is grander, more complex, and more flamboyant than any of the other palaces known to us, and it is located about twenty minutes south of the modern port town of Iraklio.

Pendlebury, John D.: The archaeology of Crete: an ... The archaeological remains of Crete first reached a wide audience through the accounts and drawings of Renaissance era travellers, such as the Italian Cristoforo Buondelmonti. Later explorations built upon these works with, for example, Robert Pashley, Capt. Thomas Spratt, and Victor Raulin writing about the island’s botany, geology, peoples, and ancient ruins in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

The Cretan Labyrinth – Myth, History, and Archaeology - # ... Malia. The palace found at Malia is the third largest palace of Minoan Crete after Knossos and Phaistos. It occupies 7500 square meters at the edge of a fertile valley near Hersonissos in Northern Crete. The palace's proximity to the sea was obviously important in the development of the site into a cultural hub for its ancient inhabitants.
